In a 1990 International Values Survey of ten countries 87 percent of Americans reported that they took a great deal of pride in their work, with only the British reporting a comparable level of satisfaction.

The survey also found that 70 percent of Americans held that view (see figure 4.1). Americans have consistently believed that hard work is the key to individual success. In the early 1900s, 45 out of 50 people

High-profile periods of four Great Awakenings in the history of American Protestantism, each of which was associated with and immediately followed by major events at policy level.

The first Great Awakening, in the 1730s, was led by George Whitefield, a Methodist preacher who traveled throughout the colonies. He was followed by Jonathan Edwards, a Congregationalist minister who emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Edwards' sermon "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The second Great Awakening, in the 1770s, was led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The third Great Awakening, in the 1800s, was led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The fourth Great Awakening, in the 1900s, was led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The fifth Great Awakening, in the 2000s, was led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The sixth Great Awakening, in the 2100s, will be led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The seventh Great Awakening, in the 2200s, will be led by Charles Gano, a Baptist preacher who traveled throughout the South. He emphasized the need for personal conversion and salvation through God's grace. Gano's sermon "The Great Awakening" was one of the most influential religious tracts ever written in America.

The passion for material enjoyments produces different effects within democracies than in aristocratic peoples.

People that had assiduity of affairs, the excess of wealth, the vices, the absence of the state turn the heart of an aristocracy little by little toward material enjoyments at first. At other times, the power of the encroachments of those who without robbing the nobles of their nobility, verse. The author's choice of words, and the outwitting nature of depicting the mind, sex, and death, are all used to describe the passions he attempts to hold during his life. His fields, his aims, are unchanged, enlarging a residence, making fine clothes, causing more comfortable living, preventing inconvenience, and so on. These objects, however, are not "living"; they are about man's effort to hold his thoughts.
